Download.The most important public health and public policy issue in the United States today is obesity. The prevalence of obesity among American children and adults has risen dramatically in the past few decades. Obesity and overweight are the primary causes of diseases such as type II diabetes, cardiovascular disease, some cancers and osteoarthritis. The prevalence of obesity among children and adults in the United States is already high, and as these health problems become more common, more children will be born with diseases linked to obesity. Yet the modern, highly mechanized food production and preparation industries generate a surplus of energy-dense foods that make these foods much harder to resist than foods of the past. These large volume foods are not just killing Americans, they are also killing our planet's biodiversity. Agricultural and food production technologies are replacing wild animals and plants with highly mechanized or genetically engineered species that contain much lower quantities of nutritional value. To feed our expanding populations, we are relying heavily on livestock and agricultural practices that are environmentally unsustainable, as well as increasing consumption of highly processed, energy dense, ultra-quick-to-prepare foods. To meet the demand for cheap energy and meat as well as the rising costs of conventional animal feed, a growing number of farmers have abandoned practices that rely on the traditional raising of animals for meat. Many ranchers are abandoning the "cow-calf" model that traditionally has been popular. Instead of eating less food and doing less, an increasing number of consumers have become more active in the process of preparing their food themselves, which means they are eating less while preparing and cooking more of their food. Today there are more than 300,000 food co-ops in the U.S. representing a community based
