When I was 11 years old, living in Dallas, I went to my favorite shop called Sweet Peach Rejector Repair in Dallas. I was invited to repair their precision measuring instruments. I started to work for them for several years, and was impressed by the great instruments they have. How about if we design a measuring instrument from scratch, an instrument that is affordable, high precision with high build quality? We did that, and that's the origin of Beko Nomad. Makers of Beko Nomad Camille: How about quality control procedures? What are they? Marinoff: Here we are in a small workshop. We have three or four staffs working here. We make each product in quantities of 1,000 or 2,000 units, checking their quality. We do not even have a specification for the product we develop. We develop it with the intention that users will enjoy it. I make prototype products, and see what people enjoy. I make one real product and make further improvements, based on feedback from a user group. Our final product is test-ready. Then we put it on the market. After our production, some user groups give us extra feedback and we make further improvements, based on this feedback. We've been doing quality control at the manufacturing stage. We also do it at the end-user level, when users give us feedback. However, we don't do it at the manufacturing level in the software field. Camille: How much of your research and development budget is spent on improving products already on the market? Marinoff: It depends on the product. We may spend between 5,000 and 8,000 US dollars, but mostly less than this. * * * What is your long term plan? I want to achieve sustainable growth
